Jeff Sessions, a former senator who was Trump's first attorney general, said on the "Today" show that he believes Comey was an "honest, honorable man" who had to be fired after he wrote a memo revealing the genesis of the FBI's investigation of the president's connections to Russia. "When the president slanders the most experienced law enforcement officer in this country, you have to take that seriously," Sessions told NBC's Matt Lauer. Sessions said he believed Trump's attack on the former FBI chief on Twitter on Tuesday morning, in which he labeled Comey a "slime ball" who was "incompetent and dishonest," was meant to influence the investigation. "And that's outrageous," Sessions said. [James Comey to give public testimony about Russia investigation: 'I think what you will see is honesty, integrity, transparency'] "He is not worth the reputation that the president has," Sessions said. "And that is what should be focused on." Sessions said he had talked to the White House and the Justice Department about whether the president could fire Comey. Sessions said his conversation with the White House was "cordial." The House Judiciary Committee announced Wednesday that Comey would testify publicly before Congress about the investigation into Russian interference in the election and possible ties to Trump campaign associates. It was Comey's first public testimony as the director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation. Meanwhile, Sessions said Trump's attack on Comey on Twitter was "wrong" and said the president had to 2d92ce491b
