`grunt.registerTask('compile', ['concat:mainTemplate', 'copy:mainTemplate', 'useminPrepare', 'uglify:mainTemplate']);` I can run the uglify task by `grunt compile` However, when I run `grunt compile:watch` or `grunt -t compile:watch` or `grunt -t compile compile` I got: Running "compile:watch" (compile) task Done, without errors. And the compiler never happens. It doesn't watch for changes in files. I tried to add the task to a different project and it's the same. What's wrong? A: the problem was caused by another task, and when it was triggered by watch it caused the task to fail. Q: Is there a way to attach my own file to e-mail to send? I'd like to let my users save some data on their own, so I was wondering if there's some way to "attach" a file to an email. I was thinking something along the lines of generating an attachment, and having the user save the file locally (which would then save the file locally). A: You can do it in Gmail and other email clients. Check this: Blog Adrián Varela is a twelve-year-old boy with a bright personality, a sporty car and a future that will make you smile. As a street artist, his practice is about him making art on public places. Varela is a Cubano from Argentina and he's been living in Uruguay for the last five years. At the tender age of twelve, he is already an artist for Argentina and the Latino American community catheters in paediatric flexible cystoscopy. To evaluate the impact of introducing a tissue forceps in the urethra of children who have undergone flexible cystoscopy as a routine procedure. Prospective randomised trial. University teaching hospital. Forty-six children undergoing flexible cystoscopy between October 1998 and March 1999. Children were randomly assigned either to a routine procedure (without a tissue forceps) or an enhanced procedure (with a tissue forceps). All procedures were performed by the same urological surgeon. The number of patients who were examined in the urethra by suction only or suction and a forceps; the number of urethral tears; the presence of urethral bleeding, haematuria, bladder wall injury, bladder distension and possible complications. Five patients (14%) were examined in the urethra without a tissue forceps and one patient (3%) had urethral bleeding. In comparison, 21 patients (51%) had an enhanced procedure with a tissue forceps and seven of these patients (33%) had bleeding from the urethra, whereas four patients (10%) had urethral injury. Bladder distension was significantly more frequent in the enhanced procedure. The introduction of a tissue forceps in the urethra significantly improves the examination of the bladder in children, but the number of complications is higher. The technique in which a tissue forceps is used is a major determinant of the rate of complications. Influence of Physical and Kinetic Characteristics on the Reactions of Organophosphate Acids with
