We have examined the presence of hepatitis C virus (HCV) RNA in normal human mammary epithelial cells (HMEC) derived from reduction mammoplasty and from both milk and milk-free aspirates. HCV RNA was readily detectable in HMEC and HMEC-derived progeny from only one of nine donors. Subsequent examination of the nonpermissive cellular environment for HCV replication in HMEC revealed no detectable expression of the recently described HCV receptors CD81 and claudin-1. The presence of HCV RNA in HMEC was supported by detection of the hepatitis C core antigen (HCCAg) in 9 of 13 HMEC lines at early passage; no further progression to HCV replication was observed at later passages. HCV RNA persisted in two HMEC lines after treatment with actinomycin D or 5,6- ba244e880a
