Shooting at Macy's, people can walk away in the store but they can't leave - tony_sebastiani ===== inthewoods A couple of observations: 1\ I think this is a much better discussion than the one that it replaced 2\ I don't get it - if you go to a crowded store and you don't leave when it gets crowded, then that means you're hanging out there? I can't imagine that people would willingly do that - I can only imagine that this is some kind of training exercise to make people realize that they should leave when it gets crowded - in which case, great, I'd be happy to volunteer for that 3\ I'm guessing this was in SF? The worst case scenario there for a robbery would be two people that were armed - not much worse than what the police could do. ~~~ thadk Number 2 is a cop-out answer. ~~~ mmanfrin The answer is two cop-outs. The first one is that people would volunteer to hang out in a place full of people. You can't hold an individual answer responsible for everyone else's conduct. The second cop-out is that the answer is not defined by the worst case scenario. So if it gets too crowded and the police can't handle it, the people should leave. A larger response, and more importantly, an action, is required. ~~~ thadk The answer is for both people to be responsible for their own actions. If someone is voluntarily there for the entertainment of others, then they're being an accessory to a crime. They could be tried for it. If someone is trying to loot the store 2d92ce491b
