In any case, this is the first time that a detailed characterization of the protein extracts from the symbiotic cnidarian-dinoflagellate has been performed. The protein levels observed in our results were markedly lower than those obtained by \[@B22]. However, we used a different approach (2D-GE) and more reliable analysis methodologies (MALDI-TOF). The comparison should be considered, as we are aware that different approaches may lead to different results. The non-identified proteins observed under the differential expression in the symbiotic state compared to the free-living condition were those corresponding to the symbiotic stage. The proteins showing the highest intensity as the symbiotic condition, 12, and 20, were related to proteins involved in cell morphology, and cellular organization, respectively. This information is in agreement with what we previously reported for the sea anemone A. pulchella\[@B27]. Several studies have clearly shown that the host and endosymbiont of A. aspersa develop a unique phenotype and interact in a mutualistic relationship \[@B31]-\[@B35]. On one hand, the host develops a symbiotic chamber in which the endosymbiont grows inside the host cell, and is associated to cellulose cylinders and cuticles \[@B31]-\[@B34]. On the other hand, the host is characterized by complex cell structures and processes in order to sustain the endosymbiont \[@B31],\[@B32],\[@B34],\[@B35]. The proteins related to cell morphology and cellular organization can be associated to the host metabolism in order to obtain all the nutrients needed by the
