It was the band's first record for Atlantic Records, and despite charting and receiving largely favorable reviews, it only reached as high as No. 94 on the Billboard Top 200 chart. The album was the band's first release on vinyl. Background and recording The Threshold of Awareness was the first record released by Tesla on an Atlantic Records label, which was the result of the band signing in March 1988 to Atlantic's RCA Records imprint. The album was the first to feature the new guitarist John Palangi, who had been recruited by guitarist Eric Peterson and bassist Dean Towns to fill in for the band's keyboardist, Stephen Roche, who had recently left the group to become a full-time session player, and had been replaced by twin brothers Gary and Michael Burns. Gary Burns (who sang backup vocals on "Winds of the East") and Eric Peterson formed the new line-up when Roche was fired. Several songs on the album were written shortly after the Stooges' Fun House was released in May 1987. Peterson said the "out of hand" reaction to the album "made us all want to write more punk like that, to remind people what we were about." "If We Could," the sixth and final song on the album, was an homage to the Stooges. Musically, the album had several similarities to Stooges' Fun House, including the frenetic pace of guitar solos. For the song "We're All Choked Up", Peterson thought the song "had the feeling of the Stooges in it, but it sounded more like the Beatles." Commercially, the album reached only as high as No. 94 on the Billboard 200 chart, and was a breakthrough record for the band: their previous album, Elektra, which had d4474df7b8
