By the very nature of the industry, being a "miner" requires that you have the best and most up to date technology and really expensive gear to remain competitive. This makes you a big target for security exploits, more and more people out there are learning to code (both software and hardware) and making their own gadgets to do their own mining which means lots of potential for malicious software (i.e. malware) and hardware. This has resulted in hardware companies dropping out of the mining scene altogether due to the high risks involved, but that doesn't mean mining needs to be done in hardware that's to dangerous. Bitband is a new mining project that's building a mining rig that's completely safe from malware, viruses and all other common malware vectors. It is currently in a closed beta, but once it's released, the team is hoping to provide a secure environment for the mining industry to flourish. Bitband – Features Bitband is all about the consumer. In essence, the team at Bitband want to create a mining rig that's safer, easier and less expensive
