Knee problems can be devastating to the running athlete. In the chronic case, the symptoms of knee pain are often dull and constant. The evaluation of the injured runner should be a comprehensive one, and the athlete should be examined both by a medical doctor and a sports medicine physician. The common causes of knee pain are noncontact injuries and tears of the menisci or cruciate ligaments. Sometimes, the patient has a loose body or bone fragment in the joint. However, most of the time, the cause is a soft-tissue injury to the lateral or medial meniscus or posterior cruciate ligament. A good physical examination and an understanding of joint anatomy and biomechanics are essential. Pain, swelling, and possibly incoordination are most helpful in determining a cause of knee pain. If further evaluation by magnetic resonance imaging or arthrography confirms the diagnosis, it is important to realize that the patient needs more than just rest and a local injection. The injured joint is subject to damage from repetitive strains on the knee joint, and the injured muscle is subject to atrophy. The ideal treatment program is tailored to the individual patient and includes an assessment of the condition of the joint and the overlying muscle groups. In the more acute cases, an arthroscopy and arthroscopy may be indicated. In the chronic cases, functional rehabilitation of the muscles and joint is important. Routine use of a knee brace is not recommended for any type of knee problem. If the athlete has a minor, mild, stress-related strain, then physical therapy and rehabilitation are the appropriate treatment. When the injury is severe, nonoperative measures such as rest, ice, and application
