Field of the Invention The present invention is directed generally to the field of information processing and more particularly to an improved tape drive cartridge. 2. Description of the Related Art Many different types of tape drives are in common use today, including tape drives used in linear tape drives, tape drives used in tape library systems, and tape drives used in hybrid tape library/linear tape drives. Tape library systems often can accommodate tens, hundreds, or even thousands of tapes. For example, the IBM 3584 library system is capable of holding 50,000 ECC'd tapes. A tape drive used in a tape library system typically has a removable cartridge which houses a supply reel and a take-up reel. The tape drive uses the supply reel and take-up reel to read or write data to or from the tape in the cartridge. The tape can be stored on a plurality of layers of tape contained within the cartridge. In some cases, tape is stored on one layer and the other layers are used for strategic purposes. For example, in the IBM 3584 library system, a servo tracking layer may be present on one layer of tape and another servo tracking layer may be present on another layer of tape. A servo tracking layer is a magnetic layer which is used to determine the location of the magnetic head relative to the tape when the tape is being read or written. If the servo tracking layer is not provided, then a separate servo tape must be used to determine the location of the head. Some tape library systems may be arranged so that the tape cartridges are inserted in the library and then extracted from the library. This arrangement is referred to as a
