More specifically, the present invention relates to an eye refractive surgery device cartridge having a gel system for mixing a gas and a liquid. A typical eye refractive surgery device includes an optical system that includes an optical element and a motor that adjusts the position of the optical element. The motor adjusts the position of the optical element based on either the patient's input or a program selected by the patient. During surgery, it is common to use gas injection to distort the eye. In particular, a gas is injected into the eye to stretch the eye. The gas distorts the eye and, once the gas is fully expelled, the optical element returns the eye to its original shape. In some cases, it is desirable to remove the gas from the eye before the optical element returns the eye to its original shape. This procedure is known as disjoining or the removal of the gas bubble. The typical eye refractive surgery device includes a cartridge for injecting gas. The cartridge typically includes a distal end for injecting the gas and a
