MUMBAI: The debate on the nuclear deal with America has been on since the BJP launched a debate in Parliament on the subject. Congress leader Rahul Gandhi has been at the forefront in attacking the government over the nuclear deal. In recent days, he has accused it of selling out India to America. On the other hand, Prime Minister Narendra Modi has defended the deal saying it is in the national interest to do so. In the debate on the deal, the MPs are to take a stand. However, in the backdrop of economic slowdown, economic security has come under the radar. Our opinions Gandhi has been attacking the government over the nuclear deal. He has alleged that the deal not only helps India, but also benefits certain companies. He has been attacking the government over the deal. He has accused the government of selling out India to America. On the other hand, Prime Minister Narendra Modi has defended the deal saying it is in the national interest to do so. Yet, this doesn't seem to have come out of the blue. Over the past few weeks, the economics of the deal have been debated in different parts of the country. Three things The nuclear deal would not only help India in the long run, but it would also help the economy. Let us look at why. US President Barack Obama talks to Prime Minister Narendra Modi in New Delhi. PTI Photo. There are three major things the deal will benefit. 1. It will help the Indian economy Consider the following: The government of India will get ~ 1.76 lakh MW of cheap power. This will help reduce the load on the power sector in the country and will allow for faster generation. In turn, this would help the economy. The US will be buying only parts and not the entire amount from India. And this would reduce the current account deficit of India.
