The park, the widest in Middlesex, has a variety of interesting and exciting displays, from plants to animals, fossils to mining. The park encompasses almost 9 square kilometres and is one of the finest examples of landscaped parkland in the country. From the elegant lines of the sculpture walk to the memorable views from the cliff top, the park has a fascinating past and a splendid future.Q: Serializing different classes with different objects I have a class named User who has an address object. The user object has an Address object. I am serializing my User object to my DB and it works fine. But I want to serialize my user's Address object. I would be saving a user's data in the DB with other objects, so I would have to serialize all of those other objects as well. I would like to be able to serialize an Address class, while serializing a User class. But I am not sure how I can do this. Should I make my address class inherit from my user object, and create a separate class that I can serialize, instead? Or is there a more "proper" way to do this? A: If the two types are the same except for the properties, the simplest way is to declare the base type for the Address class and then in your user class override the getters/setters for the properties that are different (e.g. Address.Street). You can even create a private field Address baseAddress and set/get that property. I'm not sure if this is a good design, but it can work.
