the Commission's findings are based on conflicting evidence. At trial, the City's experts testified that the cost of relocating the affected line would be $4,500,000. On appeal, the City's experts testified that the cost of relocating the line would be $5,000,000. The evidence in the record amply supports the Commission's finding that the cost of relocating the affected line would be $4,500,000. In light of this conflicting evidence, we cannot say that the Commission erred by concluding that the cost of relocating the affected line was $4,500,000. As a result, we cannot say that the Commission erred by concluding that the City is not entitled to recover damages based on its loss of "business from the fire." For the foregoing reasons, we conclude that the Commission erred by holding that the City's evidence failed to meet its burden of proof regarding: (1) whether the City is entitled to recover damages on its claim that it sustained damages to its real property; and (2) whether the City is entitled to recover damages based
