Its structure and appearance is reminiscent of the ancient Greek cathedral, the Hagia Sophia, and dates back to the 19th century. It is located in the Otrāno neighborhood in the eastern part of the capital. History The original St. Ignatius church of Russian Empire was first constructed in 1807 as a Russian Orthodox church, at the location of St. Katherine's Church (currently Evangelical Lutheran Church of Latvia, on the corner of Alġārsi Street and Drīvakalns Street), and was closed in 1920 after the February Revolution. The building was then converted into a military garrison, and from 1921 to 1933 was used as the Russian Drama Theatre. Following its conversion, the church building was renamed to St. Ignatius of Antioch Church. The church building was designed by architect Voldemārs Salkovskis, the first project was approved by Tsar Alexander I of Russia on October 9, 1807, in honour of the former garrison, who in 1812, during the second half of the Napoleonic Wars, won a significant battle in the Battle of Schöngrabern, near Bautzen, Germany. However, the Riga Governorate was the only entity to receive a building contract and it was not completed until 1822. The church was built according to the plans of architect Pēteris Bortkevics, and contained the first Orthodox cathedral in what is now Latvia. Following its conversion into a Russian military garrison, the church was closed and fell into ruins. It was finally demolished in 1933. In 1957, the cathedral was rebuilt as a synagogue and remained that way until 1990. It was renovated again in the 1990s. After Latvia regained independence in 1991, the church was returned to the Russian Orthodox Church. The church building was listed in the Cultural Heritage Register of Latvia on July 16, 2003. The current church building was reconstructed in 2011-2012 in the style of ancient Byzantine architecture. A new building was designed by architect Alfrēds Risveiks, while the bricks were provided by a private brickworks. The reconstruction also features two modern stained-glass windows and the bells of St. Ignatius of Antioch Church.
