Limitations: ⬚ 5 days trialWith the increased commercial use of electrical equipment in buildings, there is a need for energy efficient products that protect the equipment against environmental effects. Building wiring is frequently mounted in or on structural members in the building interior. This type of wiring includes both power and signal wiring. The wiring, including the insulation, must be protected from environmental conditions in the building. Protection against moisture, humidity, condensation, dust, and other environmental conditions is required. Insulation for building wiring is often installed after the wiring has been installed in the building. With conventional building wiring, the wire and insulation are typically exposed to the environment. After installation, moisture, condensation, and other environmental effects may cause premature failure of the insulation. Many varieties of building wiring are known. These include single conductor wiring, power buss wiring, and wiring with an enclosed conduit. There are a number of conventional types of insulation for building wiring. These include non-exposed conduit insulation, non-exposed electrical tape, conventional flat and crinkle type insulation, and laminated insulation. Conventional flat and crinkle type insulation has been used with exposed wiring. This type of insulation is typically installed on the wiring after the wiring is installed in
