Denver's Urban Search and Rescue responded to multiple calls Tuesday of homeless people in search of shelter and assistance. The city's Office of Homeless Services also is looking for more beds to accommodate the growing number of people forced out of shelters due to the winter. Another major snowstorm hit Denver and the surrounding area Tuesday night, shutting down roads and schools. "It's going to take time to clear some of those roads," said Jeff Montgomery, public information officer for the Front Range Office of Emergency Management, which oversees cleanup efforts. Montgomery said more than 60,000 households are being monitored for free or low-cost assistance as of Wednesday morning. More than 80,000 people are without power across Colorado, according to emergency management officials. The system is able to track about 2,500 households during winter storms, providing housing assistance. Montgomery said a plan exists to help at least 5,000 households in the region. Montgomery said 75 families have been offered emergency housing, and the number may increase. “We’re hoping to be able to get some homeless people off the street and into that kind of housing,” he said. Montgomery said finding housing can be difficult in the Denver metropolitan area, which has the second-highest number of homeless residents, behind Los Angeles. About 75,000 people live in temporary shelter in the Denver
