But it's a different story on the bond market, where yields have fallen to their lowest levels since the financial crisis in the early days of 2009. Like the stock market, investors are playing a game of 'chicken', hoping that Uncle Sam's federal government will not let its bond market implode. Some investors are so worried about the potential for a default that they are seeking "flight" to Treasury bonds, selling stock and pulling money out of stocks and other assets in order to make money somewhere else. It has been more than 50 days since the last time the 10-year Treasury yield fell below 2 percent on an on-going basis — a benchmark known as the 2-10 spread. Until last week it was only the second time that period hadn't been breached since the financial crisis. The last time it happened was back in August of 2008. The last time the yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury fell to as low as 2 percent was in July 2009, when it was at 2.01 percent. At its current level, the yield of the benchmark 10-year Treasury note is right back near the 2 percent level from the 2009 debt auction held just before the financial crisis hit, when it was at 2.52 percent. Related: MarketWatch's team on Wall Street The 10-year Treasuries are also at their lowest level in almost two years at just under 3.1 percent. To understand why yields may be declining so much, it's important to understand why the market has been so volatile. The rise in yields has been the direct result of the fierce debate about how to fix the Affordable Care Act, which is based on the assumption that the US government will need to borrow $2.5 trillion over the next decade. On Capitol Hill, a deficit ceiling has been set at 2.1 percent of the gross domestic product. So while the bond market has remained stable, the US stock market has seen wild swings, partly as a result of disappointing economic data. Investors 3da54e8ca3
