So we can help you better.I've spent a lot of my career building computer code that interacts with other code that I don't control. Recently, I've seen a few people put their entire system into disposable services. This post explains my general concerns about such a pattern, and notes a few examples. When designing systems in the future that will work with your code, keep the following in mind: 1. Protect your API - Think about how your code is going to interact with your code, and protect your API. Don't give the creators of other code the ability to freely hit you up for money. And don't give them the ability to change your code while it's interacting with their code. If your code is going to have to talk to an external system, you should have sole control over that external system. 2. Only Do Part of a Tasks - If one of your tasks can be done either by sending a message to a disposable service, or by accessing a single public, public-facing item, it should be done by sending a message. This keeps you in control of your code. Your code should have no need to know any details
