The technique allows researchers to easily detect very low concentrations of nucleic acids — DNA or RNA — in biological samples. The lab-on-a-chip technology also can detect a broad range of viruses and bacteriophages that infect humans. "The potential to automate this process of disease detection and diagnosis using a chip is revolutionary," said researcher Steven N. Alarco, PhD, assistant professor of chemical and biomolecular engineering in the U.T.D. department of chemical and biomolecular engineering and energy research Institute. Researchers believe the automated system could significantly accelerate the disease-detection process for diseases such as Ebola, because it would allow pathogen detection without the need to grow the virus. "A first step toward this goal is to develop a highly sensitive and selective method for nucleic acid detection. One way to do this is to use a nano-antenna that is designed to concentrate the sample's nucleic acids," Alarco said. The nano-antenna consists of a gold nanorod that is aligned at an angle to a gold film. Alarco said the gold rod is a good conductor of energy and hence good at concentrating on
