A New ethereum-based digital sports gambling startup SportsBet offers bitcoin players a "no-risk" deposit and withdrawal option, as well as increased deposit limits. Announced on Saturday, the blockchain-based gambling platform could enable casinos and sporting organizers to limit or eliminate risk, increase revenues and reach new markets. The company is using a new whitelabel platform that has been built with gaming enterprise software BiGo, according to SportsBet, which unveiled the platform this week at the Sibos Conference in Australia. The whitelabel platform can be configured to accept traditional casino-style deposits or immediately pay the result of a game using smart contracts on the ethereum blockchain. "We have elected to use ethereum, which is more than just bitcoin, to provide access to the blockchain and to accelerate innovation," CEO Tom Davidoff said. "The benefits of blockchain technology are that every interaction is recorded and the result of those interactions can be automatically paid. "This is a great complement to the world of traditional casino gaming and provides a credible alternative for operators who would like to more efficiently and securely manage risk and liquidity, while also providing a level of speed and security that is not achievable by traditional banking methods." Mikheil Gavrilov, SportsBet's director of marketing, told CoinDesk: "We have found that we need a dependable technology platform to operate on so that we can quickly get the game up and running, so we can accept bets in a safe and secure way." The startup will initially use ethereum's smart contracts for betting on basketball and football and soon open the door to rugby, netball and other sports. This was achieved using the company's 'BetOn' identity and access management platform
