questions about hardware architecture and efficiency/performance not on topic? I read through this discussion about asking questions related to the operating system itself. It struck me that hardware architecture and efficiency/performance do not seem as the same to me as the questions presented there seem. But I would not want to decide now, whether questions about such topics are on-topic here or not. A: I agree that it might be quite useful to know what the CPU is made of (microarchitecture, big/little endianness, etc) and how it performs

- after all, that's the main purpose of that discussion you link to. However, questions about the performance characteristics of CPUs are not welcome. The fact that the discussion wasn't about CPU design is not really relevant. The discussion was about questions asking about how Linux behaves on a specific CPU architecture. Per se, questions asking about CPU performance characteristics are about computing and computing hardware, not about Linux or Unix, so the relevant thread should have been this one.
