Tries to find the video on YouTube faster, by replacing your search keywords with numbers. You type in what you want to see, and what you want to be shown. Then after the keyword is replaced with a number, it will look for that video in the order you typed. You also can copy the link to a text editor or e-mail. You can't download videos on this tool. More details here: YouTube Red YouTube Red (also known as YouTube Premium) is a paid subscription content streaming service for online digital media (including video content) created and owned by Google and operated by YouTube. The paid service is for viewing media on a mobile, desktop computer or television via the YouTube website. YouTube Red content is available for viewing via a tab in the YouTube app and via the YouTube website. YouTube Red content can also be viewed on Chromecast Ultra televisions (notable when YouTube Red is purchased by a customer). On March 30, 2017, the service expanded to include the Google Chromecast dongle, which did not require a subscription to the service. In contrast to a free YouTube service, which is ad supported, YouTube Red allows members to access content that is behind a paywall, but with "exclusive" features such as background and text advertisements, or background and audio advertisements. Access to all YouTube premium content is provided to those who do not have a subscription and rely on YouTube Red to stream premium content. History In September 2010, Google announced that it would be introducing paid services on its platform. Later in October, Google confirmed that its YouTube paid services would be called YouTube Red. On December 15, 2010, Google began selling the subscription service to content creators to help boost revenues. Google stated that a premium subscription service would be the final form of subscription to Google's online services. On May 29, 2012, Google announced a suite of Google services, including YouTube Red, Google Play Music All Access, Google Play Movies and TV All Access, Google Play Games, and the Play Store. Services In July 2015, Google announced YouTube Red as a subscription service, separate from the free-to-download, ad-supported YouTube. The service allows access to premium content, with an option to download content for offline viewing. On March 30, 2017, the service expanded to include the Google Chromecast dongle, which did not require a subscription to the service. 77a5ca646e
