The skin tolerated to various OVDs was evaluated in vitro using human skin, in a model using an animal membrane. Both models have their limitations but the human skin is much closer to the clinical situation. Several OVDs were applied to the cutaneous surface of the human skin, and to the guinea pig dorsal skin following an exposure time of 6 hours. The OVDs were hydrophilic and lipophilic, and were all well tolerated in all types of tests. In the human skin model, ketoprofen showed the best tolerance, and in the guinea pig skin, it was diclofenac. The alcohol-free preparations were well tolerated at least in a short-term study.
