Choosing a file Like other image-editing programs, Photoshop is a raster-based application, which means that it works with a grid of squares, which are called pixels. When you open a file in Photoshop, you're actually opening a file of pixels. If you use a digital camera, you're most likely saving your photos in a format that converts them to pixels, called the `_raw` file format. For example, if you take a picture with your camera in JPEG format (see Chapter 2), you can open that image in Photoshop. Another example is if you take a picture with a scanner, you can open the scanned file in Photoshop. Photoshop also supports several different file formats that include separate layers. Some formats are more convenient to use than others. For example, the `.TIFF` format is good for your digital camera files, as it enables you to lay several different images on top of one another with little or no overlap. Unlike `.JPG` and `.JPEG` formats, `.TIFF` files don't store an image's color information in one place and its transparency information in another. Instead, they store both types of information in the same place. This allows multiple transparency masks to be applied over the same image without creating any problems. The `.PSD` format works best with the `.PSD` format that is created by Photoshop. It's also a good format to use for scanned images because it stores all the image's information in one file. You can open images of any type and size, but file formats with compression, such as the `.TIF` format, can cause problems with larger files. Although compression lets you store more data within a file, it makes the file larger. You can opt to save a file with the uncompress

Clinical presentation of familial adenomatous polyposis in children. Familial adenomatous polyposis (FAP) is an autosomal dominant inherited disease with an incidence of about 1 per 100,000. It is characterised by an increased risk of developing colorectal cancer. Most patients develop colorectal polyps within the first 2-3 decades of life. One third of all patients are asymptomatic and the median age of diagnosis is 35 years. Gastrointestinal manifestations of FAP are highly variable and range from bloody diarrhoea to intestinal obstruction, due to the development of chronic ulcerating or intussusceptive polyps or malignant degeneration. Only a minority of patients with FAP (10-15%) develop colorectal cancer within their lifetime. Therefore, the indication for prophylactic colectomy in FAP patients is subject to debate. Medical screening in general is advised, and patients with classical FAP should be submitted to colectomy at the age of 18-20 years. In patients with attenuated FAP, who are at increased risk of colorectal cancer, it is recommended to start screening at the age of 30-35 years. In patients with attenuated FAP, the risk of developing colorectal cancer can be predicted by genetic analysis. In this context, there is not yet enough evidence to recommend screening from the age of 30 years in these patients. A surveillance program by means of annual sigmoidoscopy is recommended in patients with attenuated FAP, while colectomy is recommended in patients with classical FAP. Endoscopic removal of polyps before the age of 10 years seems to prevent colon

They have told me to deliver a peace offer to you, a peace offer from you, from us, from the United States. Let's try this out: First of all, listen to this offer.
