During the transition from Player 2 to Player 1 in the Ball Control and Match Intelligence Engine modes, the motion data is used to re-create or duplicate actions from the original player (Player 1) for the player in the game (Player 2). The data is used to recreate Player 1's artificial intelligence interactions with objects, opponents, teammates and the ball. "When we launched FIFA 20 we received extremely positive feedback on how the game felt and was performing in real-life conditions," said Aaron Ramsey, Chief Technical Officer at EA SPORTS. "As we have been exploring the world of matchday performance, we have seen the power of Player 2 technology - and that's why we're so excited about the future of matchday with the introduction of HyperMotion Technology." "We've completely re-architected the Ball Control and Match Intelligence Engine to handle this unique technology," said Paul Pabst, EA SPORTS Game Director. "The combination of this technology and our proprietary AI engine creates a captivating new experience for players. We're bringing FIFA 22 to life right down to the next level of detail." This new ball physics technology is the latest step in technological evolution of the FIFA franchise. Player 2 technology first powered FIFA 19, providing Player 2 with enhanced artificial intelligence, and was also brought to life in FIFA 21 to create the best experience for the most-played, high-intensity, high-speed sports title available today. "When we looked at bringing our technology to a new level, it was clear we needed to create the most detailed, high-speed experience possible, and the next step in this evolution is to have new, data-driven solutions with massive scalability," said John Schindler, Chief Creative Officer, EA SPORTS. "We're excited to be able to deliver this technology to our millions of fans through FIFA 22." EA SPORTS confirmed the ball physics and ball control mechanics for FIFA 22 is currently in development. More information will be provided when the game is closer to release, so check back soon for additional information. In addition to the above changes, FIFA 22 will also feature improved online and competitive modes, new in-game challenges and enhancements to FIFA Ultimate Team.
