You might have already seen this slideshow at least once or twice, so you might want to enjoy it again. Your computer will not be bored since this one is quite interesting. It's quite addictive, actually. You might want to keep this slideshow for a while, so you'll have to set it as the screensaver of your choice, of course, because it will remain there indefinitely. You can change the screensaver settings, of course, to make it display the maximum amount of time per slide, or to decide which slideshow to show. You can even change it to another folder, so you'll have many different options. What does it do? You can even select the sound of the slideshow, and perhaps have a nice background music to accompany the slideshow. This slideshow tells the story of puppies and kittens. They coexist peacefully, and help each other when something bad happens. It's your responsibility to take care of them. System Information: A: My computer crashes when trying to open "Silent Hill: Homecoming" screensaver. A: My computer crashes when trying to open ""Silent Hill: Homecoming"" screensaver. A: Working perfectly on Windows 7. More than a half-century has passed since John F. Kennedy's death in the November assassination. Fifty years ago this year, a police detective named J.F. Kavanagh - the "Silent Knight" of the title - had a phone call from the president's widow, Jacqueline. Mrs. Kennedy asked Kavanagh to help clear her husband's name after a conspiracy theory surfaced that he had been killed by President Lyndon B. Johnson's administration. Here is what she said to Kavanagh on that fateful day, November 22, 1963: "I can't do it," she says. "I don't know how you'd do it. I'm such a coward I'd be afraid to open that can of worms. I've seen what can happen." In response, Kavanagh told the widow what he saw as the truth: "You'll see the truth when the public learns the facts." Twelve days later, after the release of the Warren Commission Report, the government was ready to unleash its truth bomb. In July 1964, b7e8fdf5c8
