KissSoft AG System Description " KISSsoft.The chief executive of a business in Switzerland has penned a letter of support to get his takeaway shop back on the road in the wake of the coronavirus crisis. The letter, which was published by the Vaud cantonal newspaper Neuen Zürcher Zeitung (NZZ), was sent to police by a business owner whose Taqueria Maria on the edge of Lausanne city centre was forced to close for the last three weeks as the outbreak spread. The shop owner says that he could have stayed open during the crisis and been fined by the city council, adding that this will haunt him when he eventually opens his doors again. In his letter to the police, the businessman says that he just wanted to keep running his business, but says he is now worried about a "possible last month of closures." "After the closure, I began to fear the state, so I took care of myself as much as possible," he says. "I must, however, continue to face life with increased anxiety. For those of us in the trade, 'business as usual' will mean a last month of closures." Many of the country's shops have been forced to close in the face of the coronavirus outbreak, with the country's population of 8.2 million forced to stay home as schools, universities and businesses were shut down. A total of 4,000 people in the country have now been infected with the disease, and the death toll has risen to 182 in Switzerland, according to figures released by the Bern-based World Health Organisation (WHO) yesterday. Read more Vaud Canton reported the closure of another winebar last week, the canton's trade association says that several people have complained about businesses that have flouted restrictions on opening. Robert Fubel, the president of the Vaud cantonal trade association, said that he had encountered two restaurants that had not closed because of the coronavirus in the last few days, despite being told to. "A restaurant opened in Geneva yesterday," he said. "There was applause when the owner told us that he
